“A life that is lived with fullness of peace of mind, contentment, and happiness always divests itself of everything
it does not want.”

How many of us are truly content? In a world where so many people are trying to “keep up with the Joneses,” could we not all learn something here? Is there something in your life that you need to divest yourself of? Make a commitment to catch yourself when you are feeling annoyed . . . and remember the Devil’s words, “Anyone who submits to annoyance by things he does not want is not definite. He is a drifter.”

Q What about married people who cease to want each other? Should they separate, or is it true that all marriages are made in heaven and the contracting parties are, therefore, forever bound by their bargain, even though it may prove to be a poor one for both.

A First, let me correct that old saying that all marriages are made in heaven. I know of some which were made on my side of the fence. Minds which do not harmonize should never be forced to remain together in marriage or any other relationship. Friction and all forms of discord between minds lead inevitably to the habit of drifting, and of course to indefiniteness.

Q Aren’t people sometimes bound to others by a relationship of duty which renders it impractical for them to take from life what they want most?
